Category:Vitamin D Category:TetrapyrrolsFor years, I have been calling attention to the fact that, among the troubling decisions taken by the International Monetary Fund was a decision to move the destination of principal repayments on member countries' debt from France to Belgium. This decision appears to have been made without consultation with the IMF's own voting membership (which, incidentally, represents the largest proportion of total debt of the world's countries), which is a body of sovereign states who have already made a commitment to pay their IMF-obligated contributions. Not only is the IMF behaving unethically by making such decisions without consulting its own members, it is also behaving unethically in that these unilateral decisions are creating a situation of competitive fiscal dominance. The IMF is not a true multilateral institution. It is a global governance body—that is, a form of central planning that involves creating rules for everyone else to follow. An example of the IMF's failure as a true multilateral institution is its international agreement regarding the debt sustainability of member countries. This agreement, adopted by the IMF's executive board in June 2010, has been the source of a significant amount of discord between the IMF's French chairman, Christine Lagarde, and her German counterpart, Wolfgang Schauble, over the nature and procedures of the agreement. As a result, the decision was taken in March 2012 to enter into a protocol that suspends the debt sustainability agreement and offers no guarantees that future policy decisions regarding debt sustainability will be consistent. The devil is in the details of how this protocol will be interpreted, which will take many months to settle. In addition, the stability of the Euro is another area of disagreement. As a member of the executive board, I had the opportunity to attend several meetings on this matter during 2011. It was clearly the case that the German board members were not in favor of the ongoing turmoil within the Eurozone. It seems that the situation had been fixed by the time I left in January 2012. The details of how the agreement was reached are unclear. In any case, it is clear that the IMF is not acting as a true multilateral institution. The Fund recently published its Annual Report for 2011. The reports of the International Monetary Fund (IMF) are, by convention, released just before Christmas each year. I'm sure the IMF staff are aware of this and have devised ways to ensure the reports get delivered before 2d92ce491b
