win7 well you can also try this: sudo apt-get update sudo apt-get install -f this should show the current broken packages which are causing the installation to fail. tomreyn> sudo apt-get install -f seems to have done its job, the install process seems to have continued and an install was at least hinted at. Tom22: how did it go? what did it tell you? oh wait so this indicates that the proposed updates were installed without any problems, right? which version are you running, by the way? tomreyn> what do you mean? What happened when I ran sudo apt-get install -f? "What did it tell you?" i'm not sure what you mean by that. ;) tomreyn> Well I ran sudo apt-get update and sudo apt-get install -f Tom22: ok, so those 2 commands completed successfully Tom22: which version are you running, by the way? tomreyn> which version is your 18.10? Tom22: ubuntu 18.10 (bionic beaver) "lsb_release -ds" tomreyn> 1.18.10 Tom22: this is what i said you were running: "which version are you running, by the way?" oh wait, missed you yeah, that's fine, you're running LTS. running LTS doesn't mean you're running 'unsupported' packages, but i'll tell you you should not install any packages from the proposed updates unless you know what they are and what they are supposed to do. tomreyn> so that means it did not work for you, why? Tom22: this is what happened: you ran apt update, this updated your system to the latest possible state. you then ran the following apt commands: apt-get
