Direct evidence for the in vivo activation of natural killer cells in psoriasis vulgaris. We investigated the possibility of a defective natural killer (NK) activity in psoriasis, a chronic inflammatory skin disease characterized by hyperproliferation of the epidermis, altered keratinocyte differentiation, and infiltration of activated T cells into the dermis. The perforin and the Fc-gamma-dependent lytic pathway (F-lytic) of NK-mediated cytotoxicity were examined on lymphocytes from lesional and nonlesional skin of psoriatic patients and healthy subjects. The perforin expression, measured as cell-surface CD107a, was higher on NK cells from lesional psoriatic skin than on NK cells from nonlesional psoriatic skin and normal skin (P
