Known plates having a multilayer structure composed of various inorganic layers are made of cordierite, mullite or alumina ceramics. They are used for, e.g., a heating element or a temperature sensor. The most common conventional method for producing such plates is a multilayer production process which comprises the steps of (1) producing each of the inorganic layers one after another; and (2) bonding the inorganic layers into a plate-like structure. In the multilayer production process, the individual inorganic layers are produced in the form of discs, cylinders or slabs and, therefore, some difficulties are encountered in the subsequent bonding step. A method has been proposed in which small (1.5 to 2 mm) ceramic pieces having such dimensions as can be bonded together by a low-temperature (e.g., 150.degree. to 250.degree. C.) bonding agent are obtained by cutting the ceramic into small pieces having a uniform thickness. However, this method has a problem in that it is necessary to use cutting tools for obtaining the small pieces. In order to solve the above problems, various methods have been proposed for bonding together the small ceramic pieces
