At the same time, only one actor remained on board. Being director Chuck Pfarrer was over for the season. Christopher Plummer had his day in the sun. “It was me and Bob who had the final say,” he says. Still, like his character, by far the most memorable moment in the series came late in the game. “In the middle of a dinner with a bunch of guys, Chastity comes in and says, ‘Did you know?’ But we always planned on killing him, so I wasn’t surprised.” “I had this feeling that the story would end with the two of them,” says Tennant. “Chastity felt like he was older. From the moment we started, I kind of knew what the ending would be.” That may be the most interesting thing about Tennant’s casting: not so much that he was the latest incarnation of the lovable yet foolhardy doctor but that from the moment he was cast, fans began to talk about the possibility of him returning for the movie. For one thing, he, like Smith, did not play his first incarnation of the character. “I certainly didn’t have time to be thinking about it,” he says. “There was never a point at which I was like, ‘What am I going to do when the show’s over?’ It was more, ‘What’s next?’ ” There was also the fact that in the first two season-ending episodes, “Uprising” and “The End of Time” — in which Eccleston first revealed he had been replaced — Chastity was present.
