In recent years, the use of computers and semiconductor memories has rapidly increased. Also, attention has been paid to hard disk drives as a recording medium capable of permanently storing large amounts of information. However, since hard disk drives are expensive, the price of products using hard disk drives has increased. Therefore, the search for image-forming methods and systems using a semiconductor memory has been conducted to replace such hard disk drives. Two specific methods of recording image information are generally known. In the first method, a color image is recorded by having a plurality of semiconductor memories forming color images at the same time. In the second method, gray-level image information formed by a plurality of semiconductor memories is stored in a single semiconductor memory as a gray-level image. Also, the third method is generally known wherein gray-level image information is stored by dividing the gray-level image information into data forming a plurality of blocks, each representing a single dot, and storing the divided data in the single semiconductor memory, each of the plurality of blocks being made up of a plurality of pixels (see U.S. Pat. No. 4,698,620. These image-recording methods are useful when the image information to be stored is approximately the same in size as the image-forming area of the image-forming apparatus and is formed by a d4474df7b8
