The first one is Message and the second one is List. So I have this model: `var Message = db.define('message', { list: { type: Schema.ObjectId, ref: 'lists' }, id: { type: Schema.ObjectId, ref:'messages' }, sent: { type: Date, default: Date.now }, received: { type: Date, default: Date.now }, content: String });` and `var List = db.define('list', { name: { type: String, required: true }, created_at: { type: Date, default: Date.now } });` When I need to get all the message which belongs to the list I do this: `this.hasMany('list').belongsTo('list');` The problem is that I want to list all the message from a specific list but it still return all the message from all the lists. This is my method: `this.get('messages').where({ list: this.get('id') }).then(function(messages) { var jsonMessages = JSON.stringify(mess`

I did not mess with the display property in any way in the HTML. Both are working perfectly fine in the example above. How am I supposed to get the to display, then? Another thing that isn't working is the click/hover/tap event. I'm using `$(document).on("click", ".foo.bar", function() {})` to set the event handler. When I click on one of the elements, no event handlers are fired. Thank you for your patience. I'm just learning, but I was eager to start working with jQuery. I don't know why this isn't working. 2 Answers 2 Your problem is with the double dot notation. When you write a double dot, it means to find all elements on the page with that class name. What you want to do is specifically look for elements with class foo.bar. You'll have to pass the function a reference to the element. In other words, you'll have to wrap it in an anonymous function and capture the element in an element parameter. You can then use the element parameter as a context and access the contents of the element with the class foo.bar. Thank you. My second question 2d92ce491b
