simple because it's a simple matter of devising a test for the philosophical statement of the presence of God. It is assumed that God's presence includes an awareness of the self and the environment. I suppose the test for self is awareness of thoughts and feelings; and the test for environment is awareness of the bodies and feelings of other people. Does awareness of other bodies and feelings include awareness of the mind and feelings of oneself? Some people say no, some say yes. Perhaps it is a matter of knowing and experiencing a man as a man. In any event, the existence of an abstract awareness of the self and the environment among the consciousness of self and consciousness of others in a context of mutual awareness of the self and the environment is not a matter of scientific proof. For that matter, it is not a matter of philosophical proof. Whether it can be proven or not depends on what has been labeled as scientific proof, philosophical proof, or something else. I want to make sure that it's clear that I'm not saying God is, or cannot be, proven with the scientific method. It's possible to follow the scientific method to test if anything could prove God. We haven't done that yet, but I don't think we have to worry about that. I'm talking about testing hypotheses and generating theories regarding God. The main thing that makes theories and hypotheses about God more interesting than theories and hypotheses about the bathroom is that a theory about the bathroom is a theory about toilets. A theory about God is a theory about God. I also don't think we have to

The CSV is a basic, simple and well-known file format widely used to represent tabular data, though actually it is a standard text file format with a simple “CSV” extension. But this format is quite redundant if you need a tool to read it, so I created this tiny tool that convert CSV into tab delimited format with a good looking UI. No need to download any excel sheet and add columns and rows to it. CSVReader is an application that does what it does fast, but not very well. The application does not provide any advanced options for formatting, sorting, filtering, etc. This is something that other more powerful CSV viewers have as well. It does, however, display the data of the CSV file in a simple and intuitive manner, and allows you to print it as well. With the New Year, comes a whole new set of responsibilities. Who is going to find the home? Who is going to find a job? Who is going to be working? These may sound like common questions, but they are ones that may not have been discussed. Additionally, some people may not even be aware of how they may face some of these challenges. Let’s address some things you need to consider before the New Year. Emergency contact information. This includes physical addresses as well as telephones. Birthday information is essential. This includes the child’s birth date and times. It should also include first and second names (if given) and parent’s names. In addition, you should also provide emergency numbers. Let’s face it, nobody wants to find out that their child is unresponsive. Also, you should provide an emergency contact for the parents. There are many situations that may arise that could require an immediate adult’s attention. You should also list your contact information. This includes your name and your phone number. It should be available to the family to reach you with questions or help. You should also be able to reach the child’s teachers. It is very important to also list your number to the schools. You want them to have an immediate way of reaching you. You will need it when you are getting ready to leave. Birth certificate is essential. This includes the child’s name, address, birth date, and place of birth. You should include information regarding when the child was adopted, if applicable.

1 of 4 People often wonder why survivors of sexual assault don't report incidents. According to a 2016 U.S. Department of Justice study, there are many reasons survivors don't come forward. Much of the problem centers on how society responds to these types of assaults, and how survivors themselves need to respond. “Survivors are taught to bury their trauma and self-blame,” says Laura Dunn, co-founder of Know Your IX, an organization that advocates for the rights of survivors of sexual violence. “We hope their silence will help to dismantle the stigma that prevents them from speaking up.” According to the UN, nearly one in five women have experienced sexual violence in their lifetime. And one in 27 women have experienced non-consensual sex — a figure that equates to around 16 million people in the United States. So why do survivors struggle to reveal the truth of what happened to them and access help? Shame is what survivors experience when they remember the details of their assault. It comes in waves, often lasting for hours or days on end. “It's like there's an umbrella effect,” says Dunn, “in that there are more things going on around this.” She adds that survivors may experience shame because they feel responsible for the assault. And they may feel guilty or embarrassed about things that happened to them that they weren't even aware of, she says. But that type of self-blame can be hard to shake. “I think that in a lot of ways, shame is part of the trauma of sexual violence and it's not always acknowledged,” says Dunn. Recovery Telling someone about an assault can be one of the hardest things for survivors to
