DNA strand break-inducing agents interact with decondensed chromatin. The widely recognized observation that there is chromatin decondensation during prophase-prometaphase of the cell cycle is more widely accepted and studied in mammalian somatic cells. Recently, it was observed that the breakages induced by colcemid block the late-G2/early-M transition of Xenopus eggs during meiotic maturation. The blockage was not due to an inhibition of the nuclear envelope breakdown and there was no evidence of altered chromatin condensation during metaphase or anaphase. However, it was observed that individual chromosomes often displayed condensed, decondensed and then condensed chromatin upon prophase entry. The role of decondensation, if any, has been a matter of debate. The present study was aimed to further elucidate the significance of decondensation on the amount of DNA strand breaks induced by two well-recognized DNA damaging agents, mitomycin C (MMC) and adriamycin (ADR). The results showed that the decondensation of the chromatin after the exposure to MMC or ADR was directly proportional to the extent of the breakage. However, no correlation between the extent of chromatin decondensation and the inhibition of cell growth was observed.

On the contrary, it was observed that the degree of chromatin decondensation directly correlated with the inhibitory effect on the DNA synthesis. The significance of the present observations of decondensation of the chromatin on the amount of strand breaks induced by MMC and ADR is discussed. The influence of the photochemical luminescence of aluminum on the kinetics of self-sensitized reactions of N,N-dimethylacetamide with [Mg(phen)(2)]. The reaction of N,N-dimethylacetamide (DMA) with [Mg(phen)(2)], where phen is 1,10-phenanthroline, in the presence of oxygen, followed by detailed kinetic investigation, leads to the formation of magnesium alkylperoxo species. Photochemical monitoring of the oxygen-dependent formation and decay of the magnesium alkylperoxo species was achieved through the luminescence produced upon their interaction with phen.

Thus, investigation of the lumines
