Crack.Choanocyte ultrastructure and bradytroph development in a freshwater mussel, Ceratoma fasciale. This study examines the development of bradytroph populations within the choanocyte chambers of a freshwater mussel, Ceratoma fasciale, over a five-month period. Different developmental stages were identified based on ultrastructural details of the choanocytes. These were seen as sub-stages of the bradytrophic developmental cycle. The first choanocyte differentiation is seen as two trivesicular, low-lying choanocytes and then a single vesicular choanocyte after migration to the sinus chamber. At this stage the hypertrophy of the nucleus can only be detected in the periciliary membrane. The second developmental stage is characterized by the recognition of a vesicular choanocyte within the sinus chamber and the proliferation of the nucleus of this choanocyte into the periciliary membrane, with the upper face of the nucleus being more clearly defined and seen as villiform in appearance. The nucleus within the periciliary membrane increases in size but remains a relatively inconspicuous darkly stained area. The third developmental stage is characterized by large, coarse bradytrophic vacuoles in the sinus chamber. This stage coincides with an increase in the development of endocytosis within the sinus chamber in the form of an invagination and subsequent invagination and formation of a large bradytrophic vacuole. The final stage is characterized by a large bradytrophic vacuole and the swollen appearance of the choanocyte chamber. No bradytrophic development is evident after the chambers of the most posterior part of the digestive system have completed differentiation.[Metastatic liver tumors in patients with urologic tumors. A randomized clinical trial. Hamburg Urologic Tumor Study Group]. The course of metastatic hepatic tumors in patients with prostate carcinoma or bladder carcinoma treated with radical prostatectomy, cystectomy or radiotherapy was prospectively evaluated by a randomized study during 6.4 years. Of 75 patients there were 23 (31%) metastases to the liver with a median of 21.6 months after start of treatment
