Prima. Pdf Book.Q: What is the advantage of building a C++ program with g++ in linux? What is the advantage of building a C++ program with g++ in linux? Why does g++ support while gcc doesn't? A: g++ is a frontend compiler, one that has evolved to support a number of enhancements not present in gcc (e.g. support for PIC, to name but one). The main advantage is that g++/gcc is a better integrated and more stable tool than gcc alone. The resulting executable from g++ generally runs better, because gcc just does the compiling, while the g++ frontend knows what it's doing and can provide the resulting executable with a "system library" (the libgcc⁸ libs you see) that's tuned for the target platform and can make use of the optimisations available in the underlying C++ library and C standard. It's not, however, necessary to build a C++ project with g++. g++ is, in itself, an implementation of the GNU C++ Library. This library is the only C++ library in widespread use (apart from Boost, but Boost is not C++). It is the only C++ library available on most linux distros. It is tuned to work best with C++ code and can handle very large
