The roles of P-glycoprotein in normal rat kidney and cultured NRK cells. The roles of P-glycoprotein (P-gp) in drug disposition and disease are increasingly being recognized. In the present study the distribution and function of P-gp were characterized in normal rat kidney and cultured NRK cells. P-gp was located on the apical side of the renal distal tubules and colocalized with gamma-glutamyl transferase and p-glycoprotein-2, both of which are localized to the basolateral membrane. The distribution of P-gp was altered by in vivo administration of vinblastine and cyclosporin A. In vitro, the transport of the P-gp substrate digoxin was studied in NRK cells, which also express P-gp. Digoxin, but not digoxigenin, had little inhibitory effect on the rhodamine 123 efflux in NRK cells. The in vitro transport of the P-gp substrate 17beta-estradiol was also demonstrated using different cell lines. However, there was no inhibition of this efflux by anti-P-gp monoclonal antibody or by verapamil. However, the transport of nystatin, a P-gp substrate, was competitively inhibited by anti-P-gp antibody. These results indicate that P-gp is present in the normal rat kidney, where it may play a role in the disposition of some P-gp substrates.
