Incorrect database format? No Problem! DataNumen DBF Repair is a lightweight software solution designed to help users recover data from broken or damaged database files (DBF). The application offers support for a wide variety of databases such as dBASE III, dBASE IV, dBASE 5, FoxBase, FoxPro, Visual FoxPro, and supposedly many others. The main process should carry the user through an initial scanning process. There, the app determines if the database can be recovered or not. The next steps involve repairing the said DB, making it usable again. The tool is equipped with batch processing capabilities, and on top of that with the drag and drop function two essential features for a quick and smooth operation. For databases larger than 2 GB the app should be able to split the file into one or more parts, as the predefined limit dictates. Another helpful feature is the possibility to integrate the app with Windows Explorer. Making repairing even quicker by running it from WE's context menu.

The NFL and its franchises are perfect at protecting football and reducing injuries, but the NFL and its players union really want to eliminate concussions. The NFLPA's April proposal to allow the NFL to mandate regular testing of players for head trauma would be far more draconian than any other concussion policy implemented so far. It would ensure that many players never receive repeated concussion tests — or any concussion tests at all — and that many players never receive the standard concussion tests that are administered to all other athletes. The Union's proposal would let a team subject a player to six consecutive concussions and/or medically disqualify a player if a team has a certain number of players return from injury. This proposal would create a two-tiered system in which NFL players are left with the impossible choice between violating the law and playing the game or being out of a job. It would likely result in many players choosing to end their careers. In a statement, Sports Medicine Adviser Randall Imse says that the union proposal “creates a dangerous precedent” and “reinforces a culture of indifference and defiance of league policy that would make it difficult for teams and players to comply.” The union's proposal would be a violation of federal labor law and could not be allowed, and the NFL would be forced to adopt a much less draconian policy.
