Diane Ravitch Published: Saturday, March 2, 2013 5:30 a.m. CDT By Diane Ravitch A kind reader brought this to my attention: "In the past few days there has been so much coverage of Michelle Rhee's firing of the teachers at KIPP schools. While I fully support the decision and find the firing ridiculous, I'm curious to know how KIPP schools are doing now, with the change in leadership and no longer having the pressure of a threat of dismissal. How are the kids doing?" Wow. I don't know if this is a question that anyone can answer. But I can certainly comment on what I think is wrong. In the first few years of my career I taught fifth- and sixth-grade math. My experience was that the basic skills taught in American schools were solid enough. The problems were not interesting. I am not claiming that the math in school was particularly good. But this was the content that students were being taught. That was then. As a seventh-grade math teacher, I could not believe how different the seventh-grade math class was from the fifth- and sixth-grade math class. So many things had changed. The standards were now 4th grade. The problems were harder. Students were working independently and not getting help from their peers. They were working at home on their own projects. Students were required to write out math procedures. That is a very good thing. It means that students have to figure out the procedure by themselves, not just copy it from their textbooks. Students had to write their own procedures, and they could submit them to the class. No copy from the textbook. Students were asked to explain the math with their hands. That made them understand the numbers on the board. In our school, kids were reading more, not less. And that was the real story. Kids were reading more. But were they really learning? How good are students at the beginning of the year? Math teachers of my generation were taught that if you teach good skills and they do not translate into higher levels of achievement, then you don't know what you are doing. We knew that our content was not directly connected to the most important skills needed in life. First grade is when our students should be learning these basic skills. I am not a kindergarten teacher, but they really should not be
