Emergency patients usually present with some infectious or parasitic diseases. The objectives of this study were: 1) To evaluate the number of infectious and parasitic emergencies seen in our emergency unit; 2) To identify the most common causes of infectious and parasitic diseases in the emergency unit. This was a retrospective, descriptive study which analyzed all the medical records of patients with infectious and parasitic diseases, seen in the emergency unit of our hospital over a six month period. We identified 142 cases. Patients were mostly children, with a mean age of 10 years old. The most common infectious and parasitic diseases in our emergency unit were: fever, acute otitis media, pneumonia, lower respiratory tract infections and urinary tract infections. The most common causes of fever were viral infections

(especially influenza) and bacterial infections. Pneumonia was caused by Mycobacterium tuberculosis. Otitis media was associated with Streptococcus pneumoniae. Urinary tract infections were caused by Escherichia coli and Klebsiella pneumoniae. Background Transfusion guidelines for infants and children are based on older data than for adults and are not supported by clinical evidence of safe blood product usage. Objectives The purpose of this scoping review is to identify how transfusion services are managed in the urban setting. Methods An electronic literature search was performed for the primary terms pediatric, transfusion, and urban. Abstracts were obtained from PubMed and CINAHL databases, and a quality appraisal of the literature was completed. Data Results Forty-one articles were included in this review. The majority of articles were based on the practices of academic centers and/or large children's hospitals. There is limited literature on the management of transfusion services in smaller community hospitals and/or the outpatient setting. There is a trend toward transfusion protocols and guidelines for sickle cell disease and immunoglobulin replacement therapy. Conclusion Pediatric transfusion services should be a higher priority in all urban settings, as they are in many rural areas. With this framework, providers could be more readily equipped to support children with transfusion-dependent diseases.
