Methods for quantitative determination of cyclosporin A in human serum and whole blood. We report an analytical method for the quantification of cyclosporin A in serum and whole blood by a validated method based on a liquid chromatographic technique using UV detection at 216 nm. Cyclosporin A is extracted from serum or whole blood by liquid-liquid extraction. This extract is evaporated under nitrogen stream at 60 degrees C, and the residue is reconstituted in the mobile phase. Chromatographic separation was carried out with a Nucleosil 100-5C8 (150 x 4.6 mm id, 5 microm particle size) column, while the mobile phase consisted of a 55:45 (v/v) mixture of methanol-water containing 0.1% trifluoroacetic acid and 25 microg/mL of butylated hydroxytoluene. The calibration curve was linear between 5 and 250 microg/L. The detection limit was 0.5 microg/L, the quantification limit was 1.0 microg/L, and the accuracy and precision were within 10%. Ground and Surface Based Electronic Security Technology These devices are the first line of defense for peacekeepers, international travelers, and all types of commercial users of remote services and remote monitoring applications. What's New in the?

Mr. Greeley's Strategy for Making America Think Again We need to spend more time with people who are different from us, we need to listen, and we need to learn things about each other and ourselves. We need to call out bad arguments, just as we call out bad arguments or bad behavior in others. We need to be tactful and considerate when we talk with those we disagree with. We need to make sure that our children know how to handle conflict and disagreement. We need to do things we've never done before, and we need to learn how to live with one another and with ourselves in a brand-new way. Not all of those things will work in the short term. All of them could be lost, as things currently are, because we're afraid to back down on certain positions, and we don't know how to meet those who are different from us. We are in a moment of deep change. We need to learn new strategies for dealing with each other as we go through those changes, or we'll be lost. Those of us who do some or all of those things, and who want to fight the good fight together against the authoritarians who are killing our country as fast as they can, need to be together as much as possible. If you work for one of the institutions that can help us, be there for us. Work for a foundation and build it. Be with a group of people and use every moment to help each other out, to build our own little constellation of decency. If you're the public, be there for the people we need to work with and through, who are at our best when we work with them. Get out of your own way, be there for people, don't be in a rush to shout them down, and watch the power of good that comes with it. Help people see how beautiful the world really is. Make images of freedom possible. We don't have to understand a single thing about anything. We don't even have to speak to each other at all. That's how to have a conversation with God. Evan Sayet is a comedian, writer, political humorist and activist. He lives in New York City. The Wise and Otherwise Newsletter is a satire/commentary. et al., 1995, MNRAS, 275, 1003 Minowiecki G., Sarazin C.L
