first evidence to indicate that a principal component co-variation between salivary proteins and SRR is present among men. Our analyses suggest differences between individuals in the same cohort, the effect of exposure to stimuli or physiological stress, and salivary biomarkers as potential effect modifiers of SRR. We were able to take into account an increasing number of potential sociodemographic and lifestyle confounding factors (e.g., age, education, alcohol use, smoking, medication, diabetes status) and socio-environmental factors (e.g., employment, household income, physical activity). The prospective design allowed us to investigate change in lifestyle factors, diagnoses of diseases, and use of medication, providing greater power than is typically used in panel studies. We believe that results are internally consistent, as they were replicated in two different cohorts of men and all had similar ORs. A major strength of the current study is the high quality saliva collection method applied, with reliable biological and analytical validation. Standardization of saliva collection and handling methods was carried out by trained personnel, and adherence to these protocols was monitored by regular quality control measures. Our study sample comprises of the general population living in the FITNET study area, reflecting that which would be obtained through a population-based study. While the study sample is of a similar size to some of the datasets used in the meta-analysis, the study participants were randomly selected for FITNET, and are thus not considered representative of the general population. Their recruitment criteria, however, are designed to maximize enrollment of men across the full range of socioeconomic status in the area. Therefore, we also attempted to maximize the representation of the general population by including moderate smokers and limiting exclusion based on self-reported alcohol use. As suggested by [R25], there was also a major advantage of a prospective cohort design. In prospective studies, participants do not suffer from selection bias; it is possible to trace back the cause of participation to specific population characteristics. Furthermore, the representativeness of our study population increases over time since inclusion criteria for participation are less likely to be relevant after the year of recruitment; participants are more likely to be similar to the men in the community in the time since recruitment. However, the lack of information on dietary habits of participants could potentially lead to misclassification of the exposure, despite great efforts to evaluate the potential for confounding in the associations. Similarly, it is possible that the outcome (SRR) was measured with error. Stress
