The Great White Way set out to be the dominant Hollywood storyteller and it is a miracle that it made it that far. The only problem is that the story is so perfect that it becomes a bit too perfect; too much of a story to make it to the theatre. Once you see the 'main' story you're left with a problem - there is no real ending and no real resolution. There's an epilogue - a kind of after story - but the epilogue doesn't provide resolution either. Now - and I'm far from the first to think this - I think this is actually the point. I think the whole point of The Great White Way is that it doesn't provide resolution. It doesn't end. It can't end - the story is too important to Hollywood. And if you're expecting an ending - if you're expecting something happy, or something else - you're getting it wrong. The Great White Way doesn't have an ending because the ending is all part of the plot. There is no ending because it doesn't end. This isn't to say that the history of the movie industry has been consistent - Hollywood has gone through a lot of changes - but the films themselves haven't changed very much. The stories they tell haven't changed much and neither has the character of the characters. Early in The Great White Way, before the Duke has gone through his usual routine, he tells James that he doesn't know why people talk about The Great White Way - or The Great Black Way - as if it's an achievement. "Anything at all could be a sort of achievement", James replies. I think this is the point. The Great White Way doesn't really have an ending - it is a story about stories and about the impossibility of stories. This is why people keep coming back to it - because it tells the story of the story of Hollywood. It's a kind of anti-ending. Just a couple of nights ago - in - most unusual - circumstances - I had a voice message from Jordan, one of my old classmates from University College, asking if I knew how to get in touch with the director of a production of Romeo & Juliet. While this is not surprising - as many of my friends have left London to
