You can do this by going to google.com/earth, zooming in on your area, then clicking on the magnifying glass located at the top of the screen. Clicking on the magnifying glass brings up a list of places. The first person view zooms in on the area around your cursor. You can click around and zoom in and out. You can go to layers and explore the National Park. You can explore the Charles River, Ft. Totten, both of which I've been to and more. Using the search bar in the top right corner you can search for what type of objects are in the area. You can search for museums, monuments, parks, groceries, houses, businesses. You can search for landmark street names, and other things that you might not know about your area. There is one feature that I haven't figured out yet. When you click on an object in the map, you can click on the marker at the bottom of the screen to see a brief description of that location. For example, when you click on a house, you can see pictures, a map, a description of what is inside the house, and more. There is an option to search for the history of the house in the past and present. One thing about this is you need to be careful not to confuse your own house or neighborhood with that of someone else's. These are both instances where Google.com/earth is has glitches. I didn't know how long this assault would last or how I would feel afterwards. Now that I'm back in the civilian world, I sometimes notice that I have to keep in exercise schedule or else I get depressed, tired, or even sick. I have to keep within limits or otherwise I crash and burn b7e8fdf5c8
