Perioperative oxygenation, metabolism, and injury markers in critically ill patients undergoing major abdominal surgery. To examine whether oxygenation status or other metabolic or postoperative markers, including hypoxanthine, lactate, procalcitonin, and interleukin (IL)-6, could be used to diagnose postoperative complications after major abdominal surgery. Prospective single-center cohort study. University hospital and university medical center. Eighteen consecutive patients admitted to the surgical ICU because of major abdominal surgery. Twelve patients had confirmed complications and 6 did not. Blood samples were drawn preoperatively, intraoperatively, and postoperatively at 2 and 6 hours. Oxygenation (percentage of arterial oxygen saturation [SaO₂] and mixed venous oxygen saturation [SvO₂]), lactate, hypoxanthine, and IL-6 concentrations were determined, and a procalcitonin level was measured on the day before surgery, on postoperative day 1, and on the day of discharge. Percentage of SaO₂ and SvO₂ were significantly lower in the group with complications compared with the group without complications at all time points (preoperatively to postoperatively at 2 and 6 hours). Hypoxanthine was significantly lower in the group with complications. However, lactate and IL-6 did not differ between the groups. Procalcitonin was significantly higher in the group with complications. The postoperative complications associated with major abdominal surgery are associated with the development of perioperative hypoxemia, as reflected by a decrease in the percentage of SaO₂ and SvO₂. Although hypoxanthine was lower in patients with complications, this did not prove to be a clinically useful marker in this patient group.

IL-6 was not helpful in predicting postoperative complications. Future studies are needed to examine whether routine measurements of lactate, hypoxanthine, and IL-6 after surgery can help in detecting postoperative complications and in developing a more individual
